Our Purpose

The Murray Weidenbaum Center on the Economy, Government, and Public Policy supports scholarly research, public affairs programs, and other activities at the intersection of government and business. The Center serves as a bridge between scholars, policymakers, and the public.
The Center provides small grants to initiate faculty projects and encourage research and development, provides assistance in identifying outside research funding and preparation of grant requests, provides support for major research programs that combine research, scholarly conferences, and public affairs.

The Center also sponsors workshops and conferences for scholars. These programs bring in experts from across the nation to facilitate scholarly exchange and coordinate the review of academic work in progress. They frequently lead to scholarly publications.

The Center supports research and grantsmanship through various programs, including:

The American Panel Survey (TAPS)
This Center panel survey is an important instrument for social science research and a window on public attitudes and behavior related to the issues facing the nation and the world. It allows:
- the measurement of change at the individual level
- the accumulation of data about individual respondents
- the data collection from census and other sources

Survey results will create a steady flow of opportunities for policy experts to evaluate and address some of the most important issues of the day.

Faculty Programs
The Center supports faculty research and grantsmanship in the Department of Economics, the Department of Political Science, and other programs, through a variety of activities:
- provides small grants to initiate faculty projects and encourage research and development,
- provides assistance in identifying outside research funding and preparation of grant requests,
- provides support for major research programs that combine research, scholarly conferences, and public affairs.

Student Programs
The Center also sponsors workshops and conferences for scholars. These programs bring in experts from across the nation to facilitate scholarly exchange and coordinate the review of academic work in progress. Frequently, they lead to scholarly publications.

The Center provides many unique research, writing, and publication opportunities for undergraduate and graduate students. Its scholar’s program and its small grants program enable students to work on major research projects with faculty in the departments of economics and political science.

Publications
The Center produces various types of publications in order to reach its diverse audience.

One of the Center’s key publications is its annual regulatory report (tracking the expenditures of federal regulatory agencies and their staff). This report is extensively referenced in textbooks, government papers, and newspapers.

The Center also releases reports and scholarly volumes generated from the research efforts of its faculty. In addition, the Center helps support the production and publication of the faculty in the departments of economics and political science.

External funding (such as National Science Foundation grants) provides other opportunities for students to assist with major projects.

Your Support
The Weidenbaum Center, while an integral part of Washington University, is responsible for its own financial support and relies heavily upon generous donations from individuals, corporations, and foundations. As a non-profit, nonpartisan organization, the Center falls under the University’s 501(c)(3) tax exempt status. The Center continues to seek funding from various sources.
