

SABRINA WANG

Sabrina Wang joined The diaTribe Foundation in 2018. She is a rising senior at Washington University in St. Louis, where she is double majoring in Neuroscience and International Affairs. Hoping to pursue a career in medicine and health policy, Sabrina just returned from a semester in Geneva, Switzerland, where she studied the processes of international decision-making that determine global health policy priorities. She is actively involved in neurological research at the Cleveland Clinic and the Wash U School of Medicine; she has also conducted economics research at the Brookings Institution, resulting in a publication. Outside of her studies, Sabrina serves as the Executive Director for the Washington University Political Review and volunteers at a preventative health clinic in the underserved suburb of East St. Louis. This past fall, her volunteer experiences led her to co-found East St. Louis Engaged, a political education and civic engagement initiative, in partnership with the East St. Louis Mayor's Office and United Way. In her spare time, Sabrina loves cooking (and eating!), writing, and trying to go to all 58 U.S. National Parks.
